

United Nations Security Council (Futuristic)

The situation in Greenland, 2039

Director: Raghav G Rai

Additional Directors: Gauri Tiwari, Kanav Rakheja & Ishaan Kapoor

Freeze Date: July 29, 2039

Committee Email ID: unsc2026.smun@gmail.com

The stage is set for a conquest in the frozen firmament of the High North. As the old order fractures and institutions falter, their authority thaws like frost beneath the sun. Greenland emerges from the margins to the very centre of global calculations. Once marginalised, Africa transforms into the colosseum of international rivalry. Competing powers entrench themselves through debt, security and development. Amidst this pressure, a charismatic pan-African movement, built around continental unity through water security and shared technological advancements, gains momentum like storm clouds gathering over the savannah. In an era of fragmentation, India aligns its strategic ambitions with the weight of its cultural and civilizational inheritance, ancient and audacious. Following a decisive victory in Ukraine, Russia resurges, expands its influence, and revives a sphere of control that stretches across the region like a shadow across snow. A powerful Southeast Asian alliance emerges as states coordinate militarily to protect sovereignty and survival against the encroaching tide. A new South American alliance takes shape, a nimbus, transforming regional cooperation into strategic leverage, solidarity into strength.

This is not a contest of strategic posturing nor restrained by policy but of survival, where economic lifelines and geopolitical dominance merge into a single, unforgiving calculus. Once distant and forgotten, Greenland rises as a land of near mythic consequence

As the world disintegrates into chaos, there emerge, simultaneously, certain dark forces that seek to penetrate the most prestigious addresses of power: the White House, 7 Lok Kalyan Marg, those gleaming gates that guard the machinery of governance. Operating from the shadows. Dwelling in the penumbral spaces between legitimacy and manipulation, these clandestine organisations dictate policy with silent authority, engineer electorates with calculated precision, and manufacture crises to advance interests that serve no nation, no people, but only themselves. These actors answer to no electorate, for they have transcended the theatre of democratic accountability. They recognise no borders, those arbitrary lines that constrain lesser mortals, for power flows where it will, seeking always the path of least resistance. And they thrive, positively flourish, in the very instability they sow. For chaos creates opportunity. And opportunity consolidates control that no ballot can revoke nor no parliament question, no republic repeal.

At the heart of the struggle over Greenland lies a question that every nation must confront: whether its leaders dare to reshape their destiny at the risk of losing everything, or accept a diminished place in the global order. Greenland stands as the last crown of the Earth, and whoever claims it inherits not land alone, but the authority to shape the destiny of the world that follows.