Letter from the Executive Board

Greetings delegates!

We are deeply honoured and excited to be serving as your Executive Board for this edition of the Sanskriti Model United Nations. We hope this committee gives you an enhancing learning experience and a chance to gain knowledge you will carry beyond these three days.

Since its conception, the United Nations has served as a platform for member states to deliberate on global issues, and to maintain world peace. As members of the first committee, the Disarmament and International Security Committee, it is your responsibility to craft innovative and feasible solutions to address matters surrounding arms control, disarmament and political imbalance.

The aim of this conference is to create an environment for delegates to work efficiently and collaborate to create implementable solutions on contentious issues. It is important for all delegates to be open to hearing other's perspectives and try to achieve the greater good for most participants involved.

We, as your Executive Board, are extremely excited to see each one of you in committee and are sure that each delegate will bring forth a unique perspective and strive to make the debate as lively and dynamic as possible. We hope you learn from this conference and have a truly enriching experience.

Please do not hesitate to contact us if you have any doubts regarding the agenda, the background guide, the committee, or MUN-ing in general, by emailing us at unga2026.smun@gmail.com

Thank you!

About the Directors

“The Pessimist sees difficulty in every opportunity. The Optimist sees opportunity in every difficulty”

Greetings Delegates!

I am Jai, and it's my honour to serve as your Director for the Special Political and Decolonization Committee at the Intra-Sanskriti Model United Nations, 2025.

I'm a student in the 12th grade, studying Physics, Chemistry, Maths and Computer Science. In the future, I intend to pursue a degree in Science and aim to become a Mechatronics Engineer as an adult. In addition to academics, my interests likely align with many of you: sports, music, photography, technology and automobiles! An avid traveler, I have visited all 29 states of India, capturing their diversity and beauty through a lens. I engage in philosophical and controversial discussions to pass my time. I also began learning the guitar but never mastered the art.

You would often find my MUN documentations plagued with star wars quotes, something I'm certainly proud of. One which I'll never forget is “Do or do not, there is no try,” a quote by the Grandmaster of the Jedi Order, Yoda. At first, one would categorize this quote as nothing but a short humor, but the meaning behind it is deep and concrete. It taught me that whatever I must do in life, I shall do with as much effort as I can, regardless of the outcome.

I was introduced to the Model United Nations in the eighth grade, where my friends encouraged me to participate. The first committee I ever attended was DISEC, which was a trend I followed throughout my MUN journey. Initially, I viewed it as an ordinary extracurricular activity to pass the time. However, it evolved into a transformative experience. The exhilaration of crafting rhetoric speeches, forming alliances through lobbying, and being recognized on stage to receive my first award became cherished memories that continue to fuel my passion for debate. This hobby expanded beyond my school, leading me to participate in various inter-state events with my friends.

‘Nosce te Ipsum;’ Know Thyself.

Cordially,
Jai Singh

Greetings Delegates!

“The mind is not a vessel to be filled, but a fire to be lit.” ~
Plutarch

It is with great enthusiasm that I welcome you all to the Disarmament and International Security Committee. My name is Aanya Chand and I am honoured to be serving as your Director for this edition of Sanskriti Model United Nations, and am looking forward to embarking on this journey to Africa in order to unpack complex political realities and histories with all of you.

Beyond the vibrant world of Model United Nations, I am deeply interested in biology, biotechnology, economics and policy - subjects that truly spark my curiosity, and drive me to learn about the mysteries of our world. Outside academics, I find comfort in the smell of coffee, exciting worlds contained in books, the crescendos of my piano and the rhythms of music blasting through my headphones, all of which I will happily rant about outside of committee.

My Model United Nations journey started in 8th grade, and ever since it has become one of my many obsessions and the cornerstone of my growth. Through MUN, I have gained valuable experiences and skills like diplomacy, effective communication, and walked away with countless life long memories.

I hope that this year at SMUN, you will form unique ideas and forge long lasting memories. We are immensely proud to share this experience with all of you, and hope you enjoy this committee as much as we did while crafting it for you over months of preparation (and quite a few all-nighters). I hope that you embrace this conference and all it has to offer, because it offers so very much to every person who is willing to immerse themselves in it.

Looking forward to seeing you all in committee! All the best!

Warm regards,
Aanya Chand

Greetings delegates!

I'm Ishi, and it is with great excitement that I welcome you all to the Disarmament and Security Committee at Inter Sanskriti School Model United Nations, 2026.

I'm a student in the 11th grade, studying Accounts, Business Studies, Maths and Economics. Outside of MUN, I love reading books, especially horror, watching movies, and I find solace in music. I'm outspoken about my opinions and one of my favourite past-times is to talk and debate about my favourite pieces of media. There's nothing more I love than spending hours sharing my opinions with the people around me, and listening to their thoughts on the same issues. Along with the subjects I study, my interest in history and politics fuel my curiosity, as well as my desire to become a better MUNer.

My MUN journey started in 8th grade, which was when I had moved from Gujarat to Delhi. My first committee was AIPPM, which was a committee which I loved to experience, but was not exactly perfect in. In my 3 years as an MUNer, I never landed on a committee which felt right to me, until I took part in a General Assembly committee. GA helped me become more confident, and has given me the incentive to grow and become better. One of the reasons for that incentive was the incredible support by the Executive Board, which supported me and answered every question I had. Being part of the EB this year, I hope to do the same for each and every one of you.

I am elated to be helping direct this committee, and look forward to meeting you all!

Yours sincerely,
Ishi Bhaskar

Greetings, delegates!

It is with great honour that I welcome you to this year's Disarmament and International Security Committee at the Sanskriti Model United Nations. I'm Varenia Shekhar, and I'll be your additional director for this conference. I'm deeply looking forward to having a fruitful discussion and embarking on this journey with you.

I'm an 11th-grade student, currently studying Political Science, Economics, Psychology, and Mathematics. Outside the committee, you will probably see me deliberating upon current political and social issues that intrigue me, which I am eager to discuss. I'm especially fond of exploring new genres of music (currently enthusiastic about The Weeknd) and writing that comes from the heart. An activity that usually takes up most of my time and which I'm particularly passionate about is exchanging ideas and opinions on politics and philosophy with my peers. I occasionally spend my evenings playing basketball, and have recently developed a regard toward books, which I am currently building on (open to recommendations!).

My Model UN journey began in the 8th grade as a delegate in the UNGA, which sparked my curiosity about this committee, international relations, and diplomacy. As a first-timer, I hardly had a clue what was happening in committee, but I persevered, and I am elated that I stayed.

My journey from then until now has been abundant with new information, people, and experiences. As a member of the Executive Board, I look forward to deepening these experiences at this conference, emphasizing diplomacy, meaningful solutions, and fruitful debate.

‘Carpe diem’; seize the day
Warm Regards,
Varenia Shekhar

Greetings Delegates,

I am Kiaan Uppal, and it is my greatest honor and pleasure to serve as a Director for the Disarmament and International Security Committee at Intra Sanskriti Model United Nations 2026.

I am currently in 11th grade and have taken Economics, Mathematics, Political Science, Psychology, and English. I further aim to major in Economics and Maths in college. I am a National-Level Basketball player and a fervent writer.

I first set foot in the world of Model United Nations in the 7th grade, and since then, MUNs have become an integral part of my life. I first viewed MUNs as any other extracurricular activity, but over a period, I mastered the art of crafting rhetorical speeches, crisis management, and forming alliances through lobbying. Over the past few years, I have had the chance to take part in an eclectic range of conferences, and serving as a director is truly exhilarating.

As a part of the Executive Board, I seek to encourage delegates to foster collaboration, meaningful negotiation, thoughtful deliberation on key issues, and diplomacy. I am personally grateful to MUNs for equipping me with nuanced knowledge of some of the most crucial challenges the world faces, but also providing me the platform to put forward my resolutions in front of other delegates de facto. As a director, I hope the delegates have a similar experience moving forward in the committee.

With full enthusiasm for keeping our MUN flag flying high, I hope we have a fruitful, inclusive, engaging, and stimulating conference.

I look forward to the best MUN awaiting!

Regards,

Kiaan Uppal

About the Committee

The United Nations was established and ratified by all of its member states. The United Nations was formed in 1945 with the sole objective of ‘maintaining international peace and security.’ In accordance with the United Nations Charter, the UNGA was set up by all 193 members of the United Nations and has been in one of the central positions as the chief deliberative organ of the United Nations. The UNGA has been taking action in various political, economic, humanitarian, social, and legal spheres of life. It is in the principal position in the discussion of various multifaceted issues of international concern. The UNGA is guided by two principles of cooperation to maintain international peace and security. It predominantly arranges various rules in accordance with international laws.

The UNGA divides its agenda and work among six main committees, transmitting information regarding the territorial, economic, and social status of non-governing territories to the Secretary-General. In 1993, the General Assembly, in an attempt to streamline its workflow, created the First Committee (DISEC), narrowing its focus. Many of its initial areas of interests, including self determination and specific non-security concerns, were transferred to the Fourth Committee (SPECPOL). DISEC later sharpened its mandate, exclusively dealing with disarmament and related international security concerns. With regards to the First Committee, DISEC was established as the primary body for addressing the international regulation of armaments, proliferation and the promotion of international stability through collective action.

Further, the committee was assigned the duty of addressing the illegal proliferation of weapons of mass destruction (WMD's) and trade of conventional modern weapons and arms to protect the international community's peace and security. By article 11 of the Charter of the United Nations, the committee considers issues such as disarmament related agendas, including both nuclear and chemical arms distribution; the security of outer space; developments in the field of information and telecommunications, specifically for international security.

DISEC encourages member nations to cooperate on arms control to foster international peace and stability, aiming to transition the globe towards a more peaceful and less militarised direction. The Disarmament and International Security Committee prepares international ‘recommendations’ and draft resolutions and subsequently submits to the Plenary. Thus, DISEC is recommendatory in nature and does not have the jurisdiction to pass binding resolutions.

Committee Expectations

Welcome to the background guide for DISEC! Before you go through the content, we, the executive board, would like to state a few points, which we expect you, the delegates, to abide by. We expect delegates to follow these points as closely as possible;

1. Having a Strong Grasp of the Agenda.
2. Using verified, Contextual Information.
3. Understanding the mandate of the committee; what can and cannot be done.
4. Staying consistent with policies.
5. Diplomatic conduct and professionalism.
6. Substantive, Solution-oriented debate.
7. Effective use of UN Resolutions and Frameworks.
8. Balanced representation of National Interests.
9. Crisis Adaptability.
10. Documentation Drafting and Negotiation skills.
11. Committee engagement in Caucuses and Diplomacy.
12. Responsible Bloc Leadership and Coalition Building.
13. Clear, structured speeches.
14. Respect for the procedure, fellow delegates and the dais.
15. Realistic, Implementable Proposals.

We hope you enjoy your time in this committee, respecting diplomacy whilst simultaneously making memories for a lifetime.

Thank you!

Your Executive Board (*As of the given freeze date)

History of the Agenda

Overview:

The Democratic Republic of Congo is characterised by its immense strategic importance, possessing a vast wealth of natural resources and a rich colonial history. Its own instability is a topic which is a frequent concern of international politics, considering its potential to influence the entire continent. Following the assassination of President Laurent-Désiré Kabila, the nation's instability can be narrowed down to 4 points: the power vacuum in Kinshasa, the monopoly of “conflict” resources, foreign presence in the DRC and its neighbours, and the legacy of the “Great War of Africa”.

The collapse of the Zairian state - headed by the Mobutu Sese Seko - and the subsequent proxy confrontations among the DRC's nine neighbours, made the DRC a stage for the “Africa World War” This conflict disregarded the ethnic and tribal differences on ground - deepening sectarian and ethnic fragmentation. Presently, the RCD \(Rassemblement Congolais pour la Démocratie\) and the MLC \(Movement for the Liberation of Congo\) - rebel groups which challenge the power of the Kinshasa government - control the East and the North, while the government maintains the West and South with foreign support.

Furthermore, the global dependence on the DRC for “digital minerals” such as coltan, fuels the use of DRC's mines as a tool for foreign leverage. This has led to multiple foreign interventions aimed at securing access to these reserves - leading to wider socio-economic divide and decimation of the national treasury.

Chapter 1: The Collapse of Mobutu's government and the Prelude to the First War;

By the '90s Mobutu's government had been facing increasing internal opposition provoked by years of corruption and economic decline, opposition movements becoming more prominent, spreading throughout the eastern provinces of Zaire. Additionally, the presence of armed refugee groups following the Rwandan genocide promoted instability in the region.

Mobutu seized power through his 1965 coup, supported by the West. However, his rule was plagued with problems, most notably, the collapse of Zaire's GDP, which fell by 65% during his rule. The economy shattered, citizens struggled for subsistence. These problems spread to the army, the FAZ (Forces Armées Zaïroises) was underfunded, soldiers exploited citizens for survival. Mobutu infamously told his troops “you do not need salaries, you possess weapons.”

Ethnic tensions in Zaire intensified, particularly in the east where local communities were confronted by the incoming refugee and militant groups. The areas of Goma and Bukavu saw an increase in violence- complicated by the involvement of neighboring states such as Rwanda and Uganda both of which viewed the instability in eastern Zaire as a threat to their own national security. In response, opposition forces assembled in the region giving rise to the AFDL (Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo), led by the revolutionary Laurent-Désiré Kabila.

The AFDL was quick to gain support from regional governments and the citizens of the region, both of which sought to eliminate the hostile militia operations, tolerated and at times, directly supported by the Mobutu regime. Rwanda and Uganda provided military aid and assistance to the rebel movement. Angola and Burundi joined the coalition soon after.

Chapter 2: The First Congo War (1996-'97)

The First Congo War marked a turning point in political history, not just for Congo, but Central Africa as a whole. Initially seen as a limited political effort to neutralise militia groups stationed around the Rwandan border, the effort escalated dramatically into a full scale rebellion resulting in the collapse of the authoritarian regime led by Mobutu Sese Seko. It triggered the transformation of the internal politics of the DRC, whilst simultaneously altering the regional balance of power: drawing neighbouring states into a power-struggle.

The war's origin can be traced to the regional instability following the Rwandan Genocide of 1994. Approximately two million refugees fled the border into eastern Zaire. This led to the establishment of large refugee counts all throughout the region of Kivu. Most of the refugees were civilians seeking safety and security, however the camps were also inhabited by former members of the RAF and members of extremist militant groups including 'Interahamwe'. These armed groups soon integrated themselves within the refugee camps forming a new military enclave, which the state was unable to subdue. Exploiting their proximity to the Rwandan border, they launched cross-state raids into Rwanda, aiming to impair newly established government agencies formed under the Rwandan Patriotic Front. The presence of the hostile militias represented a direct and immediate threat to the Rwandan leadership. It is important to note that the government under Mobutu refused to or was unable to dismantle the network of armed militias.

The complex ethnic composition of eastern Zaire aided the tensions. The militias perceived the native Banyamulenge community of having connections with Rwanda and were thus suspicious of the group, leading to the region being targeted by the militant groups, leading to destabilisation. In response, neighboring states Rwanda and Uganda began supporting the opposition within Zaire, whose motives were to not only dismantle the hostile militants, but also to ultimately remove Mobutu from power, replacing him with a new democratic government.

Several opposition groups allied to form the AFDL, led by Laurent-Désiré Kabila, a long term revolutionary figure who was known to oppose Mobutu's regime. Kabila served as the face of the movement. The military strength heavily relied on the support of Rwanda and Uganda, who offered training and direct combat assistance. The rebellion was formally set into play in October 1996 where coordinated attacks on militant camps were organised by the coalition. Rwandan and Ugandan troops entered the state. Mobutu's FAZ, afflicted by corruption and lack of funding, was unable to suppress the movement. Countries such as Angola and Burundi joined the coalition. Throughout the early months of 1997, the AFDL continued its march west, capturing cities such as Lubumbashi, a strategic mining city. With each victory to the coalition, the regime's authority weakened. Political elites within Kinshasa began distancing themselves from the president. The collapse of the government appeared inevitable. Several Western powers, who initially supported Mobutu's coup of 1965, shifted their stance as the rebellion progressed; diplomacy was attempted, but did not succeed in producing a settlement. In May 1997, the AFDL captured the capital, Kinshasa. The now ill, elderly Mobutu fled the country, marking the end of three decades of authoritarianism.

Shortly after, Kabila declared himself president and formally renamed the state the 'Democratic Republic of Congo.' Kabila announced the establishment of a modern transitional government and promised progress after years of misrule. However, the shift was not a complete victory; the Rwandan and Ugandan leadership, viewing themselves as 'instrumental' to the success of the AFDL, expected to retain considerable influence within the region. For these reasons, they retained their troops in the country, particularly in the East, near the border. The presence of foreign troops and worries about their expanding influence soon became a source of concern. Certain groups within the country began viewing the rebellion as a means of expanding foreign influence over the Congolese. Tensions between Kabila and his former allies escalated as he aimed to assert greater independence for the state. Within a year after the fall of Mobutu's regime, relations between Kabila and his former supporters deteriorated significantly, setting the stage for an even larger conflict, etched forever as one of the most destructive wars in modern times.

Prelude to the Second Congo War

Laurent-Désiré Kabila's presidency was essentially a military operation by Rwanda and Uganda. To the residents of Kinshasa, Kabila appeared to be a puppet of Kigali. This belief was supported by the naming James Kabarebe, a high ranking military official, as Kabila's Chief of Staff. This meant that the FAC (Forces Aériennes Congolaises) was commanded by a foreign power. As Anti-Tutsi sentiment grew, Kabila realised that to survive politically as a Congolese nationalist, he had to distance himself from his patrons.

The primary reason Rwanda and Uganda helped Kabila achieve his position was to secure their own borders. Rwanda expected Kabila to help them hunt down the Interahamwe hiding in Eastern DRC. However, by early 1998, Kabila proved to be unwilling to hunt down these groups. Rumours began to circulate that he himself was reaching out to these very Hutu militias to build his own military force, independent of Rwandan control.

The tension between Rwanda and Kabila finally led to Kabila's preemptive strike to dismiss Kabarebe as Chief of Staff on July 14, 1998. Following this, on July 27, he announced a "second liberation" from foreign occupiers, ordering all foreign troops to leave the DRC immediately.

This announcement marked the beginning of the Second Congo War on August 2, 1998.

Chapter 3: The Second Congo War

On August 2, 1998, the 10th Brigade of the Congolese National Army (FAC) stationed in Goma and Bukavu mutinied against Kabila. This mutiny was motivated by feelings of fear and suspicion regarding Kabila's recent expulsion of Rwandan advisors. The soldiers, who were ethnic Tutsis (Banyamulenge) believed this signaled an impending ethnic purge.

This mutiny was given political legitimacy by the formation of the RCD. It was immediately and heavily reinforced by regular troops from the Rwandan Patriotic Army \(RPA\) and the Ugandan People's Democratic Front \(UPDF\). The objective of the RCD was to seize the Kivu provinces and march westward to Kinshasa.

In the west, Operation Kitona was launched by the former Chief of Staff, James Kabarebe. Rwandan forces hijacked three civilian aircrafts in Goma, loading them with elite troops that flew across the country to land in Kitona. Within days, these troops took control of the Inga Hydroelectric Dam, effectively cutting off electricity and water supply to Kinshasa. This led to the besiegement of Kinshasa - its people starving and in extreme condition.

This offense was halted by Kabila's appeal to the Southern African Development Community \(SADC\). This paved the way for Zimbabwe and Angola's involvement. On August 23, Zimbabwean paratroopers and Angolan armoured columns hit the Rwandan backed rebels. This intervention turned localised rebellion into a permanent continental war. By early 1999, the anti-Kabila rebellion began to splinter. The rise of the MLC, led by Jean-Pierre Bemba, was backed by Uganda. It seized control of the Congo river, effectively blocking the country's food, fuel and medical supplies. This logistical siege forced the government to rely on expensive airlifts from its Rwandan and Angolan allies.

On July 10, the Lusaka Ceasefire agreement was signed as an attempt to end the war by calling for the cessation of hostilities and the initiation of Inter-Congolese dialogue. This agreement failed to address the economy, hence all parties remained in place to guard the lucrative mining sites. The war did not end - it simply became a "frozen conflict" where minerals were traded like weapons.

In response, the UNSC officially created the United Nations Organization Mission in the DRC \(MONUC\).

Chapter 4: The Assassination of Laurent-Désiré Kabila

The assassination of the president on January 16th, 2001 was one of the major turning points in the war. The country was deeply involved in the Second Congo War. Large portions of eastern Congo remained outside the control of the central government whilst foreign troops continued to operate across Congolese territory. Within the ongoing warfare and political fragmentation, the sudden death of the president led to a rising uncertainty and concern amongst citizens.

On 16 January, 2001, Kabila was shot inside the presidential palace located in the capital, Kinshasa by a presidential guard. The attack occurred in the midst of rising tensions within both the government and the military. Initial reports were marked by confusion and speculation. Various conspiracies regarding the motives behind the attack, and who the offender may have been were published. In the immediate aftermath, the state's security forces swiftly secured government buildings and points of interest to prevent escalating instability.

Concerns regarding the future leadership were soon to follow. The nation, already divided by war, was threatened by the incoming political vacuum. Senior politicians rushed to establish a succession plan, preventing the fragmentation of the government and maintaining continuity within the state.

Laurent-Désiré Kabila's son, Joseph Kabila was chosen to resume presidency on 17th January, 2001. He was relatively unknown among the international community, primarily due to his young age. He served within the Congolese Armed Forces prior to his appointment. This move was intended to stabilize the situation, reassuring the citizens and international allies of the state that the government would stay intact.

By 18th January, the DRC remained torn between government forces, rebel groups and foreign armies, leading to speculation over the political future of the state. Questions regarding Joseph Kabila's abilities were raised, especially in a crisis as such. The leadership transition struck at a moment when the nation's stability and the wider balance of power in Central Africa remained highly fragile.

Legal Aspects

Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement

The Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement was signed by heads of state of the Democratic Republic of Congo, Angola, Namibia, Uganda, Rwanda, and Zimbabwe.

Some core legal obligations defined in it include the cessation of hostilities, which mandated an immediate end to all air, land and sea attacks, as well as attacks of violence against its citizens. The agreement also established a legal timetable for the withdrawal of foreign troops from the DRC. Above all, it reaffirmed the DRC's sovereignty and territorial integrity, which allowed the DRC to acquire legal basis for challenging foreign presence. It also provided for the disarmament of armed rebel groups and a unified national army formed through inter-Congolese relations.

The International Court of Justice treated the agreement as a “modus operandi” - practical framework - rather than as a document that let foreign troops in the DRC. Although not defining it as a treaty, it confirmed that the agreement caused binding obligations between the signatory states. The inclusion of rebel groups complicated the status of the agreement under international law, as it granted the rebel groups an “upgraded” status but lacked formal treaty capacity.

Accused Violations of Humanitarian Law

Throughout the course of the Second Congo war, civilians faced multiple mass massacres, rapes, forced recruitment along with forced child recruitment, forced displacement, executions, torture and unlawful killings.

Mass massacres:

Some prominent violations of International and Humanitarian law from the DRC UN Mapping Report of 1993-2003 are:

A. March 1993-June 1996:

The first period covers violations during final years of President Mobutu and the Rwandan Genocide, particularly in North and South Kivu.

The most serious violations were concentrated in Katanga, North Kivu, and Kinshasa.

B. July 1996-July 1998

The second period mostly consists of the actions of other countries which led to violations. Congo's AFDL backed by Rwanda's APR, Uganda's UPDF, and Burundi's FAB, overthrew President Mobutu and orchestrated mass-killings of Hutus, members of the former Armed Forces of Rwanda (104 reported incidents) while the FAZ also perpetrated widespread attacks.

C. August 1998-January 2000

The third period, concerning violations between the start of the Second Congo war and the assassination of Kabila included 200 incidents and was characterised by the intervention of the DRC fighting alongside the FAC (Zimbabwe, Angola and Namibia).

Forced recruitment:

1. The AFDL recruited and used children as soldiers - known as Kadogos - during their march towards Kinshasa.
2. Kabila used more than 10,000 children, some who were under seven years old, to serve under him.
3. The Kadogos were also subjected to torture and forced participation in executions to desensitise them.

Executions, torture and unlawful killings:

1. Targeting of Hutu Refugees: Tens of thousands of unarmed refugees were killed as they fled westward by AFDL forces, supported by the Rwandan Patriotic Army. They systematically attacked Hutu refugee camps in eastern DRC.
2. Detention abuses: Suspensions of treason led to detention, where prisoners were treated with "cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment"
3. Sexual violence: In Kinshasa, AFDL units were reported to have gang-raped the wives and daughters of former FAZ soldiers. In one documented case, a group of soldiers poured hot wax over a victim's body after gang rape.
→ Rape is classified as a crime against humanity under the International Criminal Court \(ICC\) Law. In the DRC, rape was a highly prevalent issue, systemically used to terrorise, punish and loot civilians. 4820 rapes were calculated in North Kivu alone. Over 65% of the victims were children, and 91% reported severe trauma.

Political Aspects

Fragmentation of State Authority

In the DRC, the national army (FAC) controls only the western half of the country, whereas the rest is divided into “taxation zones” controlled by rebel groups that act as governments, issuing permits and collecting their own customs duties at borders. Currently, the country is split into 3 main republics - Kinshasa, which is under government and SADC control, Goma, under the RCD/Rwanda administration and Gbadolite, under the MLC/Ugandan administration.

The assassination of Laurent Kabila has exposed the lack of a clear constitutional succession plan for a wartime assassination. The transition to Joseph Kabila is being handled by a military high command, instead of a civilian court, signaling a shift to martial law.

The proliferation of clandestine militant groups and non-state actors has become fuel for the further fragmentation in the country. Local self-defence militias that recognise neither the government nor the rebels known as the Mayi-Mayi. Their presence means that even within “rebel-held” territories, there are pockets of total lawlessness where no central authority exists.

The presence of foreign armies means that the Congolese land is often governed by foreign military commanders rather than Congolese civil servants. This violation of the DRC’s territorial integrity has led to a further split in how it is governed.

The central authority in Kinshasa has lost control of over 80% of the nation’s natural wealth. Rebel groups have established their own taxation hubs - creating a monopoly over the nation’s valuable resources such as diamonds or colton. In some areas, the Congolese Franc is rejected in favor of the US Dollar, Rwandan Franc or Ugandan Shilling. This monetary fragmentation makes it nearly impossible for the central government to implement national fiscal policy or combat hyperinflation.

The AFDL

The Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo-Zaire was formed in October 1996 in Lemera, Eastern Zaire. It was formed by 4 disparate groups: the PRP

(Parti de la Révolution Populaire), led by Laurent-Désiré Kabila, the CNRD (Conseil National de Résistance pour la Démocratie), led by André Kisase Ngandu, ADP (Alliance Démocratique des Peuples), representing the Banyamulenge, and the MRLZ (Mouvement Révolutionnaire pour la Libération du Zaïre). This quadripartite alliance was formed in opposition of a common enemy: the Mobutu.

Rwandan Vice President Paul Kagame later admitted that Rwanda was fully responsible for the AFDL's offensive. The group was pertinent to allow Rwandan and Ugandan troops to enter Zaire and dismantle Hutu refugee camps.

Kabila's absolute control over the AFDL was cemented after the assassination of André Kisase Ngandu, the more moderate military leader, allegedly by Rwandan forces with Kabila's consent. On May 17, 1997, Kadogos entered the capital and Kabila declared himself as president, unilaterally renaming the country the Democratic Republic of Congo. Additionally, Kabila banned all other political parties - effectively creating a one party state.

Kabila also created the Comités de Pouvoir Populaire (CPPs). Officially created as neighbourhood-level committees to mobilize the masses, they functioned as surveillance networks for the AFDL in reality.

The AFDL never fully transitioned into a functioning civil service. Instead, it became a military commercial network where loyalty to Kabila was paramount. Furthermore, the AFDL's internal contradiction - being a Congolese nationalist party directed by Rwandan generals - and Kabila's growing fear of a coup by the Rwandan Chief of Staff, James Kabarebe, paved the way for the inevitable collapse of the party. The expulsion of foreign troops by Kabila fully eradicated the AFDL as a coalition. The Rwandan-backed members defected to the East to form the RCD while the Nationalists stayed with Kabila.

As of now, there is no institutional mechanism to handle Laurent Kabila's death due to the AFDL's demolition of all other political institutions - the Parliament, the Judiciary and the Opposition. Hence, power has been passed to Joseph Kabila, his son, in a purely dynastic/military fashion. Additionally, the current government refuses to share power with the RCD rebels as they view power sharing as a return to the puppet status of 1996.

Economic Aspects

I. The Foundation: Kabila's Precedent (1996–1997)

The economic DNA of the Second Congo War was actually coded during the first rebellion in 1996. While Laurent Kabila was still a rebel leader of the AFDL for the Liberation of Congo-Zaire, he began signing mining contracts with foreign firms to fund his march toward Kinshasa. By granting these concessions before he had any legal standing as a head of state, Kabila established a 'character of legality' for the unauthorized exploitation of resources.

By mid 1997, a new class of businessmen from Rwanda and Uganda had already begun operations in the eastern DRC, mapping out the richest mineral deposits. This early exposure gave foreign military commanders a sense for the region's wealth, which many observers believe heavily influenced the decision to re-enter the conflict in August 1998.

II. Phase One: Asset Seizure (September 1998 - end 1999)

Mineral Depletion: Rwandan forces emptied the supply of SOMINKI \(Société Minière et Industrielle du Kivu\). They raided an estimated 1,500 tons of coltan and 3,000 tons of cassiterite to Kigali within a month.

Agricultural Seizures: In January 1999, Ugandan General James Kazini and Jean Pierre Bemba of the MLC launched an operation that continued for two months in the Equateur Province to seize coffee stocks. This crippled the Société Congolaise du Café, which was the region's largest producer, and forced it into bankruptcy.

Banking Heists: Rwandan forces and RCD rebels targeted local banks as they captured towns. In Kisangani, they seized between 1 million and 8 million Congolese francs from the central bank.

Similarly, Bemba's troops emptied bank branches in Bumba (400,000 Congolese francs), Lisala (500,000 Congolese francs), and Gemena (600,000 Congolese francs).

III. Phase Two: The Systemic Machine (1999 – January 2001)

The Rwanda Model: The RPA supplied the workforce for mining. The profits were conveyed through the BCDI \(Banque de Commerce du Développement et d'Industrie\) in Kigali. By late 2000, approximately 29 tons of coltan were being extracted from RCD-controlled areas every month.

Ugandan Model: Decentralised exploitation continued in Uganda. High-ranking officers established criminal cartels functioning as private businesses. Despite little to no domestic diamond production, this greatly impacted Uganda's national economy.

The Zimbabwe Exchange: The government financed the war through a direct exchange of arms for concessions. Zimbabwe provided military support to Kabila in exchange for vast copper and cobalt mining rights, which turned its defense into a long-term corporate investment.

IV. Economic Consequences

Monopoly: Foreign troops forced local businesses to shut down and established fixed price schemes for palm oil and other staples.

Human Capital: Forced labor was normalised in the mines, and the MLC and RCD recruited 12-year-old children.

Ecological Debt: The environmental casualties were catastrophic. Nearly 4,000 elephants were slaughtered in Garamba Park between 1995 and 1999 to fund various sectors through their ivory.

Social Aspects

First Congo War

Rwandan Genocide

During the Rwandan genocide in 1994, ethnic Hutu extremists killed 1 million Tutsis and moderate Hutus. More than 2 million Hutu refugees crossed Congo to settle in the provinces of North and South Kivu.

Several non-Tutsi groups in Kivu were termed ‘Mai Mai’, who actively fought against Rwandans in the Rwandan army and Rwandans in the DRC’s army.

Second Congo War

Over the course of the Second Congo War, often termed as Africa’s world war, an estimated 3.8 million deaths took place overall. These deaths were primarily caused by starvation and succumbing to diseases. A majority of the deceased were children.

Child soldiers

Preceding the Second Congo War, the Kadogos were young fighters recruited by Laurent Kabila as he moved from Zaire to Kinshasa in 1977. They were a topic of discussion because they intimidated the civilian population and consisted of untrained members. Following this, Kabila employed them in ‘re-education camps’ for members of the FAZ.

Sexual violence

Towards the end of the Second Congo War, data collected includes rape victims of the ages two and three, as well as several cases describing sexual violence against men and male children. The WHO investigated rape in North Kivu, South Kivu, Maniema, and Katanga, and concluded an estimated 40,000 rape victims.

Current Day Situation

Rebel Movements

- The Kagodos were a group of untrained children who were recruited into the AFDL 1996 onwards. Some Kagodos were sent to guard former president Joseph Mobutu, where their treatment of prisoners later led to those prisoners joining Anti-Kabila movements. Kigami's stated aim was to create a zone in the DRC-Rwanda borderlands controlled by its own troops to create more distance from Hutu groups in Eastern DRC.
- On July 27, 1998, Laurent-Desiré-Kabila ordered foreigners, especially Rwandans, to leave Zaire, which was largely ignored. On August 2, 1998, the troops of Kabila's army, including many Rwandans, escalated violence and mutinied. These members formed a new rebel group, the RCD. The RCD was headed by Emilie Lunga, the former civilian leader of the Katanga Tigers, formed by former soldiers loyal to Moise Tshombe in the early 1960s, who had been repeatedly dissatisfied with Joseph Mobutu's government.
- In February 1999, Uganda formed the MLC, including members of the former army of Zaire, still loyal to Joseph Mobutu. Together, Rwandan and Ugandan soldiers controlled a third of northern DRC.

MONUC's Paralysis

- Post the Cold war, there was a rapid increase in the number of UN peacekeeping missions. The UNSC then introduced 20 new operations between 1989 and 1994, increasing peacekeepers from 11,000 to 75,000. Peacekeeping operations were organised in Angola, Cambodia, Mozambique, El Salvador, and Namibia, among others.
- The general success of earlier missions raised expectations for UN Peacekeeping beyond its capacity to deliver. This was especially true in the mid 1990's in situations when the Security Council was not able to authorize sufficiently robust mandates or provide adequate resources.

- Major missions were established in areas with ongoing violence like former Yugoslavia, Rwanda and Somalia. These three high-profile peacekeeping operations came under criticism as peacekeepers faced situations where peace agreements were not adhered to, and where the peacekeepers lacked political support and resources. As civilian casualties increased and hostilities continued, the reputation of UN Peacekeeping suffered. With a vast and unstable region to cover and a thin spread of peacekeeping forces, it led to the environment for the paralysis of the MONUC.
- The setbacks of the early and mid-1990s led the Security Council to limit the number of new peacekeeping missions and begin a process of self-reflection to prevent such failures from happening again.

Humanitarian Crises and Social Aspects

- Kabila also began removing ethnic Tutsis from his government and took measures to weaken Rwanda's military presence in eastern DRC. By the late 1990s, it was becoming clear to the world that targeted campaigns against Hutu populations during the First Congo War (led mainly by Kagame's army) amounted to war crimes. This growing international consensus reflected poorly on the fledgling Kabila regime.
- Kabila's removal of ethnic Tutsis from his government, and targeted campaigns against Hutus during the First Congo War by Kagame's army clearly amounted to war crimes.
- With increasing Hutu-Tutsi ethnic violence and conflict, both sides feared their destruction as a race. The Kinshasa and Hutu-aligned forces aimed to expel the armies and proxy forces of the joint Ugandan and Rwandan forces.
- While the Rwandan and Ugandan forces worked together to gain territory at the expense of Kinshasa, competition over resources led to the weakening of their relationship.

- The Great Lakes Refugee Crisis continued from 1994-1996, following the Rwandan genocide, over 1 million Rwandans, mainly Hutus, fled to Zaire, and other neighbouring countries like Tanzania and Uganda. Katale was the largest camp, while the Bukavu region had over 300,000 refugees in 27 camps, and Uvira had 180,000 refugees in 12 camps
- As Kabila's army moved towards the west in 1996 near the end of the Great Lakes Refugee Crisis, reports of massacres and brutal repression arose. Kabila's ADFLC seemingly massacred 60,000 civilians, a claim strenuously denied by the ADFLC. Allegations of disappearances, torture and killings also arose.

The Assassination of Laurent-Desire Kabila

Laurent-Desire Kabila for most of his life was a minor rebel leader operating out of the mountains of South Kivu. His only encounter with the world of power came with the mass instability in Rwanda and Uganda following the aftermath of years of genocide. He rose to power, being the Congolese figure to lead their military campaign at the time to eradicate the Interahamwe militia that was the main cause for the 1994 Rwandan genocide.

His AFDL rapidly spread across the country, and in 1997, he entered Kinshasa and declared himself President, after renaming Kinshasa, the Democratic Republic of Congo. Later on, Rwanda and Uganda launched a second war, backing new rebel movements, to force him into submission. By January 2001, Kabila was internationally isolated. He began alienating Western donors, refused to consider engaging with the Lusaka peace process and banned political parties.

At 10:00AM, on the 16th of January, 2001, Laurent-Desire Kabila was shot inside the walls of the Palais de Marbre, by one of his very own bodyguards, an 18-year-old boy named Rachidi Kasereka. The incident took place inside Kabila's own private office, and with the aid of other presidential guards, he was escorted out of Kinshasa to Zimbabwe for treatment. By this point, it is reported but not officially confirmed that the President of the Democratic Republic of Congo, had died. Unverified reports were making the rounds and conspiracy theories flooded the state, as the fate of the President is still a mystery.

Ugandan and Rwandan Interests in Eastern Congo:

Rwanda's Interests:

Rwanda justified their presence in Eastern Congo to be due to the Hutu extremist militias, which were responsible for the 1994 genocide against the Tutsi. In July 1994, almost 1.5 to 2 million Hutus fled to eastern Zaire to escape the brutal past they had to endure. Therefore, Rwanda intervened in order to help remove Mobutu, and turned against Kabila who was collaborating with the forces Rwanda aimed to eradicate.

Beyond the immediate need for security, and economic interest in the area due to high mineral wealth, Rwanda triumphed in the region. Since Eastern Congo had a significant population of Congolese Tutsi, Rwandans thrived as they stood for the protection of the Tutsi communities and in return, building a proxy military force that served Rwandan strategic interests. They grew more profitable with the trade of Coltan, a mineral essential for suppliers of mobile phones and electronic devices, bringing in wealth to the region, especially in 2001.

Uganda's Interests:

Uganda's main security concern was the ADF, an Islamic rebel group, that was conducting violent attacks in western Uganda, including bombings and raids that killed multiple Ugandan citizens. Additionally, Uganda was also concerned about the West Nile Bank Front, which was home to remnants of anti-Museveni armed groups. The move into Eastern Congo was also a profitable economic strategy, as Museveni's Generals were directly involved in commercial operations like diamond and gold trading networks, and timber extraction.

By 1999, Rwanda and Uganda ties were broken as they battled for the city of Kisangani, Congo's third biggest city. In 2000, the second war for Kisangani commenced, this time even more violent, with the United Nations Security Council condemning both Rwanda and Uganda specifically for their actions.

Bloc Positions

→ Democratic Republic of Congo

At the freeze-date, The Democratic Republic of Congo, the primary state affected by the conflict, is shaped by decades of external influence and intervention paired with deep internal fragmentation and various weakened government institutions. Following the two wars, the state has stressed on the preservation of sovereignty and integrity as its topmost priority. Support for foreign troops and rebel factions has been viewed as a direct violation of international law and a continuation of foreign interference in regional affairs.

The DRC advocates for stricter international mechanisms to regulate resource extraction; for the DRC, the root of the instability lies in both internal divisions and the sustained involvement of neighbouring states such as Rwanda and Uganda, particularly in eastern Zaire, a resource rich region. Exploitation of these natural resources, such as coltan, gold and diamonds by both foreign parties and internal militia has inveterate conflict.

The Congolese face severe internal challenges including weak infrastructure, limited military, the continued presence of non-state armed groups among others. While the government is happy to accept international assistance in the form of aid, it remains cautious of external involvement that may threaten its already shattered sovereignty, similar to the two wars. The state thus supports a balance between international collaboration and support with respect for autonomy.

Within this committee, the delegate is expected to push for resolutions that emphasize non intervention, disarmament of non-state militia, strengthening of fragile state institutions, increased UN peacekeeping support, strengthening bonds with neighbouring states, peacekeeping efforts for the entirety of Central Africa among others. The delegate must use the example of the destruction caused by the first two wars to persuade the committee and set a standard.

→ Rwanda:

The state of Rwanda and its position in the committee is directly influenced by the Rwandan Genocide of 1994 and the security threats which followed. The presence of dangerous, armed militias, which include former members of the RAF and the militant group Interahamwe on eastern Congo was framed as an existential threat to the state's national security. Rwanda has so far justified its involvement in the DRC by defending its acts as a defensive necessity.

Rwanda has consistently mentioned the failures of the UN and various other international groups in addressing the dangers of the armed militant groups present in Congo, forcing it to take unilateral action. This defensive stance reshaped the foreign policy of the state, especially in regards to eastern Congo.

It is to be noted by delegates that Rwanda's actions in Central Africa have not been seen as positive by most. They have drawn significant criticism from both neighbouring countries and the broader international committee. These questions primarily arise regarding allegations of resource exploitation, followed closely by accusations of supporting rebel groups operating within Congolese territory; while Rwanda has continually denied such claims, the accusations have helped contribute to tensions with Congo.

In this meeting of the Disarmament and International Security Committee, it is imperative that the delegate representing the Republic of Rwanda advocates for stronger 'counter insurgency' frameworks, disarmament of hostile militias across Central Africa and recognition of state rights to self-defense, whilst simultaneously resisting any acts or proposals that place blame on its actions within Congo.

→ China

China, tending to its strict broader foreign policy principles, sovereignty in particular, approaches the conflict through focusing on infrastructure development and resource based partnerships not just in Congo, but throughout the continent of Africa. China has historically avoided direct military involvement in African conflicts.

The state's interests in the region are primarily the resource rich regions of the DRC, which were deemed essential for global manufacturing and technological development. China views stability in Congo not only from a humanitarian perspective, but with a vision for a flourishing economic alliance in the near future. China supports the concept of achieving stability through political discussions and diplomacy.

China has often expressed skepticism towards cross-border military action and has emphasized the importance of international debate and diplomacy in resolving conflict through the grounds of the United Nations. Within international forums, China has openly supported peacekeeping efforts, but has specifically advocated for mandates which are well defined and respectful of the host nations sovereignty and consent.

The delegate representing the People's Republic of China should strategically promote diplomacy, emphasise the importance of immediate economic reconstruction, upbringing modern government importance and suggest UN led peacekeeping with mandates for limited foreign intervention. The delegate must hold a stance against aggressive foreign interference or actions that may undermine state sovereignty.

→ Egypt:

By January 18, 2001, Egypt's stance on the conflict was majorly shaped by its role as a regional power within Africa. Egypt, a firm believer in regional integrity and stability has consistently supported regional, African nation-led solutions to conflicts on the continent, supported by multilateral frameworks.

The state views the current instability in Congo as a threat to the continent of Africa as a whole; in particular, the disruption of the economy, emigration & immigration and most importantly, the spread of armed conflict across borders. Often considered a major African power, Egypt emphasises the importance of cooperation and diplomacy between all African states in addressing internal conflicts without much reliance on external powers.

However, it is important to note, Egypt is aware of the risks posed by prolonged foreign military presence within African nations. In their vision, this risks undermining a state's sovereignty and in certain cases, creating a severe dependency on foreign governance. The state, like many others, supports a diplomatic, balanced approach that combines regional, inter-African collaboration with international assistance.

Egypt is advised to abide by their strong foreign policy: to advocate for African-state led initiatives, strengthened regional collaboration with efforts to promote and or, preserve bonds and to strengthen regional security measures in light of the two wars of Congo with UN collaboration that respects long term sovereignty and stability.

→ France:

The French Republic holds a unique position in the conflict, highlighting its historical involvement in African affairs as well as its broader goal to maintain stability within ‘francophone’ and Central African regions. While France was not a central actor in the Congo Wars, it has openly engaged in diplomatic humanitarian efforts including supporting UN peacekeeping operations and often, guiding joint, multinational interventions.

France, by 18th January, views the conflict in the DRC as a severe humanitarian crisis having broader implications for international peace. France, historically, has supported initiatives or actions aimed at immediate conflict resolution including ceasefire agreements, peacekeeping deployments, among countless others. At the same time, the French have advocated for a system of accountability, aimed at addressing both human rights violations and illegal exploitation of invaluable natural resources.

When it comes to strategy, France observes a rule-based international order. Essentially, to exalt the role of the United Nations in managing conflicts. France, unlike the other nations spoken about so far, is open, and often supportive to the idea of foreign intervention, viewing it as an effective means of shutting down conflicts and providing support as soon as possible.

The delegate representing the Republic of France is expected to push the committee towards robust UN-led mandates to secure peacekeeping, accountability programs for the aforementioned reasons, disarmament initiatives (specific to Central Africa) as well as stronger international oversight of natural resource exploitation. The delegate must emphasise the importance of coordinated multinational action to stabilize the affected region.

→ Nigeria:

The Federal Republic of Nigeria sees the conflict in Congo as a major power in Western Africa. Nigeria, a longtime contributor to maintaining peace, has openly supported the ideology of African-led solutions to African conflicts. Hence, Nigeria prioritizes the values of maintaining regional sovereignty.

Nigeria views the conflict as a representation of the effects of collapsing government institutions, illegal arms flows, and the proliferation of militia. The state believes that to ensure long-term peace in the region, the termination of hostilities as well as strengthening weakened institutions, followed by the disarmament and further reintegration of combatants, is necessary. The state, aware of the damage caused by external intervention such as harming sovereignty or leading to foreign dependency, stands firmly against the idea.

Nigeria, already experienced in peace-maintaining efforts through past frameworks such as ECOWAS, supports multinational action. Its stance combines defensive assistance with diplomacy and dialogue. It emphasises the role of the United Nations in legitimizing such efforts.

The delegate representing the Federal Republic of Nigeria is likely to advocate for UN backed operations targeted at restoring peace, widespread adoption of DDR programs, control and strict enforcement over arms proliferation in Central Africa. The delegate must emphasise that stability driven by African states is more likely to be a long term solution as compared to stability being imposed externally.

→ Russian Federation

The Russian Federation maintains its stance of non interference, opposing unilateral intervention and preserving state sovereignty. Following the Cold War, Russia has remained conscious of Western military operations. The state views these operations as potential precedents for interference in domestic affairs, hence violating regional sovereignty.

The state recognizes the scale of the humanitarian and economic crisis in the DRC but maintains that solutions must be discussed internationally through recognised frameworks. Russia firmly opposes ad hoc coalitions, claiming their resolutions are often made in haste and largely, inconsiderate of the future, only fostering short-term solutions. It supports the role of the United Nations in matters of international peace & security while also emphasizing that all intervention must have clear legal authorization.

Russia's strategic outlook aims to maintain influence in international security discussions. The state also aims to counterbalance Western dominance in multinational institutions. Russia is likely to resist proposals that expand on previous mandates on foreign intervention that could be used to justify regime change.

The delegate representing the Russian Federation is expected to stand for mandate-specified UN peacekeeping operations, disarmament measures and diplomatic negotiations. The delegate must stand against the creation of broad interventionist frameworks, unilateral military action and externally influenced political restructuring in Congo.

→United States of America

The United States of America primarily kept a diplomatic stance in the Second Congo War. The Bill Clinton administration treated the Rwandan-Ugandan border instability as a matter of internal security and respected their sovereignty. However, Anti-Kabila sentiments were also heightened during the Clinton administration, and Kabila was described as unpredictable and incompetent, a narrative (Pro-Rwandan) heightened via the American media.

This bias against Kabila led to diplomatic pressure in the implementation of the MONUC, with lesser implications for Rwanda and Uganda, also reinforcing the pro-Rwandan stance. The MONUC, an underfunded initiative, was backed by the United States of America, primarily supplying logistical support rather than combat.

The delegate representing the United States of America may emphasize security and humanitarian concerns, and support its limited pressure on resource exploitation, as economic aspects were secondary in the United States' interests.

→United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland

The United Kingdom had less direct involvement in the Second Congo War, aligned with the USA's stance, favouring Rwanda and Uganda border security over Kabila's claims of sovereignty towards Congo.

Britain rejected France's calls for humanitarian interventions, did not commit troops to MONUC, and rejected France-led EU missions, all of these choices favouring a multilateral aim, like the United Kingdom's involvement and support for the Lusaka accords.

The United Kingdom also rejected UN Panel reports calling out British companies' illegal mining practices and Rwandan and Ugandan looting, much like the USA.

The delegate representing the United Kingdom is expected to favour Rwanda and Uganda border security interests, while diplomatically handling Congolese sovereignty.

→Somalia:

Somalia's involvement in the Second Congo War was a direct result of its own lived experience in state collapse and foreign intervention, and therefore the country approached the situation with a commitment towards state authority and the principle of non-interference.

Somalia recognises the ongoing political and humanitarian hardships in the DRC, and the instability and turmoil expected to occur post the assassination of Laurent-Desire Kabila. The country stands to prioritise negotiation and international cooperation in order to resolve security concerns. Additionally, Somalia greatly supports the Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement as a foundation for change and resolution in the area, and backs a properly resourced MONUC mandate.

The delegate of Somalia may advocate for foreign military withdrawal, all Congolese party dialogues and UN oversight to ensure peace and security in the region. The delegate must also oppose any document that legitimises the military presence of Rwanda or Uganda under the pretext of security.
